Why Hire a Workers' Compensation Attorney?

An important thing to keep in mind when deciding whether or not to hire an attorney is the cooperation of your employer. In general, when your employer admits that they are responsible for your injury and is actively helping you with the expenses and lost wages, you probably don't need to hire an attorney. It's only when a company refuses to accept fault or admit they are liable for the expenses that you should hire a workers compensation attorney. If the injury is relatively minor, you missed little or no work or your employer admits the incident occurred at work, you may not need to hire an attorney because there won't be much disagreement between you and your employer. You may also want to hire an attorney if you have a preexisting condition that was made worse by the workplace injury. Some employers may try and claim the injury existed prior to the workplace incident, and this can be difficult to refute.

A lawyer can help with a lot of different circumstances, including:

- If your permanent disability rating is doubted or questioned
- If your claim gets denied
- If you have preexisting medical conditions that complicate the case
- If your other benefits (such as SSDI) are reduced as a result of your claim

A lawyer's main goal is to help you get the largest compensation possible. A lawyer will fight for you in all of these situations so that you can focus on recovering.

What is Workers Compensation?

Workers compensation is essentially an insurance policy to be paid out to workers that are injured on the job. The workers compensation definition differs from state to state but in general, an employer is financially responsible for injuries that happen on company property as long as the employee was following the direction of the company. This is voided, for example, when an employee is misusing company property, such as driving a company car while intoxicated or using company property while not at work. If an incident does occur on company property and all criteria are met, the employer is typically liable to pay all damages to the employee. This includes hospital bills and medical expenses, but also lost wages. If an employee is injured on the job and is unable to come into work the next day or week, the employer is responsible for continuing to pay them. The workers comp case can expand with each day of work that is missed, and it is important to hire a legal professional like a workers compensation attorney if the case becomes too large to settle out of court.

Who Pays Workers Compensation?

A workman's comp case is generally between an employer and an employee and if they employee can prove that the injury happened during company time or at a corporate sanctioned event, the employer is liable for both damages and lost wages. The employer will most likely not be responsible for paying workers compensation if the injury happens outside work ours or if the injury occurred due to the negligence of an employee. For instance if the employee was using equipment for something other than its intended purpose, the employer may not be liable for the injury.

Auto Accident Claims: Maximize Your Compensation

If you are in an auto accident and you want to maximize your compensation, you may want to seek the help of a personal injury specialist. These injury specialists are used to working with insurance companies and legal professionals to determine which treatments can be handled by the defendant. In order to maximize your compensation, you will want to make sure you see a specialist that is used to treating patients under these conditions. You don't want to be liable for procedures that will not be covered under your workers comp settlement. This is one of the reasons why it is better to hire a personal injury specialist over a general doctor to handle a case like this.

If you are looking for a personal injury specialist and you live in Chicago, you are in luck. There are many experienced professionals just waiting to help you out and they are all just a phone call away. What you can start by doing is calling the people at Midwest Injury help and scheduling a free consultation.
